AUSTRALIAN LABOR PARTY

FEDERAL PERSONNEL

1901 - 1975

COMPiled BY

L. F. CRISP and BARBARA ATKINSON

JULY 1975
This compilation is a further development of the earlier Australian Labour Party: Federal Personnel, 1901-54 by L.F. Crisp and S.P. Bennett. It is, again, a by-product of research for other purposes.

The categories of personal data sought were:
- Date and country (or State) of birth; date of death;
- Religious affiliation; standard of education; vocation before entering Parliament; whether offices held in trade union; local government career; State Parliamentary career; Federal Parliamentary career.

We have included broad religious denominational background (Protestant, Catholic, Jewish, Freethinker). The history of Australian politics over the past 85 years has repeatedly shown the relevance of this background, though it has also been clear that, from politician to politician, denominational background or active affiliation has varied greatly as an influence on or determinant of political attitudes or decisions. Moreover, whilst the denominational background (what we have been almost exclusively concerned with here) is one thing, practice of one's religion or continuing adherence to one's denominational origins is another. In a few cases where, to our knowledge, the subjects made no bones about the matter, we have listed their mature-age position as 'freethinker' or 'rationalist' rather than denominational background. We suspect this to have been in fact the mature-age private position of others, but for want of knowledge of public acknowledgement of the fact we have in such cases given only the denominational background classification. Nor have we indicated instances where to our knowledge subjects have transferred their denominational memberships.

For all or most of Labour's history in all States a member of the A.L.P. has, as a precondition of party membership and of eligibility for endorsement as a Labour parliamentary candidate, been required to be a member of the union covering his calling. On the other hand, where a member has not had a union covering or clearly covering his calling, or where he has fallen out with or for some (sometimes political factional) reason been expelled from or refused admission to his union, he has usually been able to 'qualify' for admission to the A.W.U., Miscellaneous Workers' Union or Clerks' Union or some such compendious or accommodating union. It has therefore not seemed worthwhile to record the union or succession of unions to which each Labour parliamentarian has belonged. But wherever it has been possible for us to ascertain a significant office-holding in a union we have recorded it as noteworthy and possibly significant.
This collection of our data has been harder to come by and check in some cases than we had anticipated. First, some of the data we wanted had not been deemed to be appropriate for Parliamentary officials to accumulate and record. Second, the Electoral Office does not require some of the data (e.g. date and place of birth) which might seem relevant to M.P.'s role in public affairs. Third, Fred Johns, who compiled the successive volumes of "Who's Who" for the first thirty years of the century, seems to have regarded Labour Members (other than the top men) as of little interest to himself or his contemporaries. Fourth, some former Labour Members slip from public view after leaving Parliament and are not the subjects of metropolitan Press obituaries upon their deaths. Fifth, a few Members and ex-Members are reticent about some details of themselves and their careers. We even came across one Labour ex-Senator who changed his year of birth in at least three successive editions of "Who's Who" - a novel substitute for the elixir of life and the secret of eternal youth. Sixth, the memories of families and friends of some of the earlier Members have proved hazy and imperfect.

It is not surprising, then, that we have not got as complete data, or as completely verified details, as we should have liked. What we have to offer is neither 100 per cent complete nor, perhaps, 100 per cent exact. It is the best we could compile after months of searching, incidentally to other work. We are most grateful to the Members, officials, librarians and others in every State and in the Capital Territory who have helped us. We shall welcome any corrections and any supplementary information within the categories listed above regarding the Parliamentary biographies.

We hope this material will save other research workers some of the tiresome hunting we have been involved in. They are welcome to use any of it with the usual acknowledgments.
